There are 2 deobfuscated files from the published executable One of them is void *. __cpp_exception(this); The other is void this; The second file is just a wrapper that looks like it's generated from the first file at compile time. The C++ language has no concept of "recursion". This looks like an attempt to represent a recursion but it's not. The purpose of the second file is to defer the function call to the point where it's "needed" (at runtime) by defining a local variable holding the address of this. By marking the local variable as extern, the compiler knows that this is a pointer to a function (void) and it can be called later (it's valid C++ syntax, it's not C). C/C++ is case-sensitive, which is why __cpp_exception is __cpp_exception and this is this. Q: StructuredText string with list of urls I am using Sphinx with ReStructuredText for a web app. I have a block that represents a page.
